GOOD TAX NEWS

Conceded that 1930 and 1931 will produce larger business profits, wage increases and, consequently, more federal revenue, Secretary Mellon, with the approval of President Hoover, recommends that Congress cut $160,000,000 from the nation's tax burden for those years.

It is reassuring to learn that the chief executive and secretary of the treasury have such implicit faith in the preservation of the prevailing state of prosperity for at least two more years. It is good to feel that the government is spending less than it collects. Tax reduction is good news to every taxpayer.

The administration wants individuals with incomes of less than $8,000 and corporations to be in on the cutting of this "tax melon." Its reduction plan is a horizontal slash in the rate of income taxation of one per cent on the first $4,000, making that tax one-half of one per cent; of one per cent on the second $4,000, making that rate two per cent, and of one per cent on corporation incomes, making that levy eleven per cent.

Tax reduction is a popular subject at all times, but the stock market slump makes it more than usually popular at this time. If it fails to cheer some it is because the tax cut will apply to 1939 incomes, the tax on which will be paid in 1930, and it is the 1929 income that is being damaged by the bursting of the stock bubble.

Federal economy, government policies favorable to business, and national prosperity, fostered by the administration, make it possible for Washington to offer to the taxpayers at this time a substantial tax cut. And the administration's plan of distribution of the tax reduction indicates a desire to reward those who have contributed most to our prosperity.

KEEP TO RIGHT

There is one traffic rule that is uniform the country over. It is "Keep to the right." And of all traffic regulations it comes nearest to being universally violated.

Two-lane highways make it important that each vehicle keep to the right and use only its rightful share of the road. So essential to traffic safety is the observance of this rule that most states enforce it more rigidly than any other highway regulation. In most states it is a serious offense to pass another vehicle on the crest of a hill or on a blind curve or to travel on the left side of the road at such points.

Crusades concurrently in progress in several states have as their objective the breaking of the habit, so common everywhere, of slow drivers "hogging the road." There is a saying among motorists to the effect that "the slow driver requires the most right-of-way."

Quite as many accidents are caused by slow drivers as by speed maniacs, and the snail's pace operator who also hogs the road constitutes a still greater traffic hazard.

Parallel and multi-lane highways do not solve the problem. Where there are two lanes for each traffic stream, there are slow-moving vehicles which persist in monopolizing two lanes by straddling the dividing line. All the world a highway would not keep some drivers out of the way of other traffic.

What this country needs is stock guaranteed for 10,000 miles.

"IS EVERYBODY HAPPY?"

By ELEANORE CAREY

Copyright 1929 Warner Bros. Pictures Inc.

This novel is based on the Warner Bros. & Vitaphone production starring Ted Lewis

SYNOPSIS

Victor Molnar, the great Hungarian violinist, and conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of the Budapest Opera House, comes to the United States with his wife and young son, Ted, so that the latter may have greater opportunity for a career as a violinist. His father has taught him to play on the violin presented to him by the Emperor Franz Josef at the time of his command performance. On the voyage across the Atlantic Ted plays the violin in the steerage. Coins are flung down to him from some passengers on the first cabin deck.

INSTALLMENT II

"But, father, we haven't much, and what does it matter?" Mrs. Molnar, having realized acutely the pangs of a gnawing stomach and of the hardship of literally taking the food out of her mouth for them, when there was just a little to go around, continued to pick them up.

When Ted finished playing, he was startled by the interest of the smart people on the upper deck. He looked up at them, and he felt at once a bond of sympathy for they were just the sort of people he had always known in his own home in Budapest. They had flocked to his father's house to the little musicals it had been the old gentleman's pleasure to give. Fine himself, a little cloud fell about his shoulders. Somehow, he felt unhappy—as if no one could possibly be allowed to belong to her. But then—after all—what did it matter? There was business to be attended to—and he must not become entangled in an affair of the heart, or sentimental. And he tried to put the thought of her out of his mind.

A blast from the ship's whistle distracted the attention of the passengers from their dancing, and the upper deck and the steerage deck rushed to the rails to look upon the scene before them, nudging, pushing, and craning their necks. The skyline of the second largest city in the world became more plainly visible through the haze of the westerly sun. The tall buildings, with their spires and towers pointing, as the Statue of Liberty had pointed, heavenward—to hope—new life—untold experience and happiness. The sun from the west gleamed in each window of these tall, fairy castles and gave to the weary home-comer a sense of welcome and peace.

The three Molnars clung together, watching with amazed eyes the great metropolis blossom out of the night in the distance like a Japanese flower opening its petals to the sun on the water.

The expressions of their faces was, to say the least, varied. Ted—his youth and boyishness lent people, highly cultured, and very learned.

"It will do," said the son, "until I can find work."

A little apart from the others stood the slim, straight, boyish figure of an American girl, modestly attired in gay sport clothes. That her interest was not only in the music, but also in Ted, was apparent and as the boy bent over his violin to cut all the long, romance and rose dreams of a future in a new world into his music, the girl's eyes gazed at him keenly. Ted thought—

"She is so beautiful—but for me—a steerage passenger—unattainable! I do not like to think she feels that I am nothing but a peasant with a soul for music. I would like—," and his thoughts were jumbled—sort of a vague delirium of thought—the girl—Hungarian Rhapsodies—a new world—the applause of multitudes—music—life—love!

A blast of noise—the sound of horns and violins and all sorts of musical instruments, mingled together in one crash of harmony and put an end to Ted's playing. The ship's band had begun a jazz number for a dance held on the upper deck.

Ted looked up bewildered to find that everyone had left the rails except the girl whose appearance had so inspired him. She still gazed at him with half closed eyes, as if the melody he had been playing, had not ceased, but lingered in her mind to the accompaniment of the dreams it had invoked. Slowly Ted's eyes were attracted to the girl's slender shapely foot—and its beat-beat beat in time with the music. Here was the American music! Here was the expression of the American soul—carefree—happy—sure of itself! Loud and boisterous perhaps, but there were many measures in practically all its music whose slow rhythmic harmony carried a sweet appealing melody. Ted hoped he would soon get used to this sort of music—while fascinated by its natural softness while his musically trained soul disliked it, but—the girl liked it! And Gail (for that was her name) seemed representative of the people in this new country.

Ted put his violin down. No use trying to play against that riotous sound. It had, to his mind, no rhyme or reason—he could scarcely make head or tail of it—so new and strange it seemed to him. Against his will, Ted looked once more to the upper deck. Two laughing children were at the rail beside the girl, each holding one hand and trying to drag her away. Ted was shocked. This young beautiful girl the mother of two such large youngsters. And in spite of a tense fervor to his face. He was awed—mystified and he thrilled to the new life—in great anticipation. His mother's face resembled a sweet, contented flower, smiling her resignation at the strange fate that had brought her on this long voyage. There was a bit of excitement, too, about her manner for she felt this was the land of opportunity and there would be no more woe at the door. Mr. Molnar—face lined, a tired old man—so shabby and seemingly futile, disgusted with the prospect of living in this place which seemed to be feeding itself on noise, confusion and more noise. But as he looked at his son, he felt relieved. He counted on the boy to carry on the tremendous work in music he had started in Budapest. There was no question in his mind as to the ultimate success of his undertaking.

"My son, this is a young and vital country. You will undoubtedly have a career greater than I had in Hungary. In America one becomes better known than in the old world. They seem to advertise more extensively. In truth, it is the land of opportunity."

Someone spoke in English—someone who had evidently been to the country before—said with sarcasm, "The land of opportunity—and noise!" Ted, his mother and father climbed the stairs to the apartment which had been advertised as "beautiful" and "very desirable" and "reasonable" They were weary with searching the city over for a place to live, and Mr. Molnar had grown irritable with the noise and confusion that seemed to be everywhere.

The little walk-up flat would have to do—their money was rapidly disappearing, at that "cheap" hotel, and Mrs. Molnar told them of their straitened financial circumstances.

"It will do," the son said, "until I find work, and then we will get something better."

"I suppose," the old man told the solicitous landlord, who was standing nearby awaiting the verdict, "I might as well hear the noise from this place as from one of your 'exclusive' streets. It won't cost us so much to listen," and irately and resignedly he paid the rent and at once the Molnars began settling themselves in their new home.

But Ted was restless—and after a short few minutes he said, "I want to go to see Lena at the theatre!"

St. Ann's To Try For Fifth Straight Victory

By T. M. Juno

Bristol St. Ann's will try for its fifth straight victory on Sullivan's field tomorrow when the Roxborough eleven comes here as an attraction.

In winning its last four games the Bristol St. Ann's has counted 97 points, while their opponents could score but one touchdown and one extra point.

The locals will be without the services of both its regular wingmen tomorrow. Gilardi is still nursing an injured shoulder, while Roe has to attend to church duties. It is likely that Coach Pico will shift Dugan to an end post and put Stallone on the other. Stallone filled in capably in Gilardi's place last Sunday.

Roxborough holds a 12-0 victory over the Bristol eleven and from all accounts seems to be having an enviable record this season. Tomorrow will tell the tale.

Game begins at 2:30 p. m.

RECUPERATING

"Iron Man" of Giants Claimed by Death

Joe "Iron Man" McGinnity, one of the great baseball pitchers of all time, succumbed to the ravages of a tumor at his sister's home, Brooklyn, N. Y. The beloved figure of the diamond, as late as three years ago, at the age of fifty-four, was still to be found throwing his famous "up-curve" in a small Middle Western league.

UNIONTOWN, Pa., Nov. 23.—(INS)—Mrs. Louise Kohler, pretty blonde East End woman, was eager to have her sister in Germany come to Pittsburgh, but the family income is small—or rather, it was small until Mrs. Kohler hit upon the idea of becoming a woman chauffeur.

Undaunted by the scorn with which woman drivers are met, Mrs. Kohler has been driving for several women in the East End who report that her sunny disposition and her intelligence make her a splendid companion as well as a skillful driver.

Day of Thanks Will Be Marked By Churches

We should think seriously about the nation wide every member campaign," says Rev. Boswell, "which is an effort on the part of the whole Church to reach and to enlist every baptized person. The rector has already mailed to each person a letter, and a letter from the finance committee will be mailed in the course of a few weeks. Our budget for 1930 is a very modest one, approximately $6,000, and if everyone will do their honest part, there will be no deficiency."

Harriman M. E. Church
"This is the season of the year when we are called upon to give thanks unto God for all his benefits," says Rev. Gilbert A. Duck, pastor of the Harriman M. E. Church. The pastor's theme for the evening service will be in keeping with this thought. The subject for the morning worship is: "The Mighty Man of Valor."

The Epworth League meetings are well attended. Next Wednesday evening they will hold a social in the church.

A meeting of the Sunday School Board will be held next Friday evening.

Zion Lutheran Church

A brief congregation meeting will be held after the morning service.
